Clarity

All week long, I have been mourning the old windows from the house’s antique integrity.
My father segregates bubbled glass from withered siding, his fingers still miracles in sunlight and splinters, fixing my mother’s house.
Each hammer-chord splits me; before, the metronome of metal on roof and wall was the sound of my father’s success, the way he could transform a moldering foundation, encase it in chrysalitic tarp, rebirth it with wooden floors and new paint.

Now I hear the beats and see skeletal hands.
Every nail my father forces into the boards is a scratch on my arm. How much can a body survive before it breaks? How long until cacophony overruns the mind and cracks it?
From the beginning, all I wanted to be was someone other than the crumbling statue of my mother, ten years ago, staring everlong out the kitchen glass and straining to hear my father’s truck tires on the broken oyster-shell driveway.

I am haunted by men. The window panes, new and clear, reflect with eerie perfection the body I have become, shrouded and waiting in a courthouse, waiting for the scent of love and fear mingled on my lover’s neck to draw me away from the witness stand, so that I never have to say yes, he hit me as I speak to the gloss on the attorney’s bench, in which I can see, reflected, the lover who built me into nothingness, so like my father, his ghost-knuckles purpled and cracking above his polished shoes.

At home, my father scratches his beard and installs the next window. My mother pours cold tea into green glasses and they sit in an accusing silence in the heat.
How long until he forgives himself for sipping my youth away in slender brown bottles, for making me this kind of woman?
From the beginning, all he has wanted is the universe to explain itself to him. But hearing its silence, he leaves the cup, emptied, on the table, for my mother to wash.
