Artemisia in the Metro

Abstract
The “art poem” is an intriguing form of poetry. In writing about something that is inherently visual, a poet must remold a work of art into new material, drawing upon the work’s elements of form such as color, line, use of light, contrast, and composition to make his or her own reflective statement, beyond simply describing the artwork’s own content. In my poetry I aim to take this model of the “art poem,” and, through extended experimentation with this idea of ekphrasis (writing about art in a poetic context), intend to suggest a more intimate connection between art and language.

This collection of poetry was inspired by the life and paintings of Artemisia Gentileschi, an Italian Baroque artist studied frequently by feminist art historians for her professional success in a predominantly male art world. Of particular examination is her rape trial in 1611, when her father and mentor, Orazio Gentileschi, charged her painting tutor Agostino Tassi for taking her virginity. It is often noted that, in giving her testimony, Artemisia was subject to thumbscrew torture in order to “verify” to the court her claim of rape. The case was ultimately dropped, and she was married off to Florentine artist Pierantonio Stiattesi, subsequently moving from Rome to Florence and later to Naples. The character of Artemisia as an artist, traveler, woman, and mother is a voice I revisit in my poems, using both her life and my own experiences as a foreigner abroad to reinterpret her legacy in a modern context. Other themes I explore from this storyline include the emotional complexities of family, the relationship between nature and art, and the place of the female traveler as an “other” in the global community.

Epitaph for Artemisia

After Artemisia Gentileschi’s Judith Slaying Holofernes, painted in 1620. Presently located at the Galleria degli Uffizi in Florence, Italy.

It was too terrible, the duchess said, too terrifying for a woman to be caught in the murderous act of slaying her lover.

She did not want to see the gentle spray of blood, the tenderness with which the heroine severed her enemy’s head, cutting her village from tyranny like the trimming of cloth. They say the artist painted herself in the picture, grasping the long dagger in a burning hold of passion, there, in her simple golden dress and her intricate cameo bracelet, the sword its own muscle in rhythm with the stains of crimson that bless the two women like holy water. Even her servant flinches from the body, hesitantly holding the sleeping man down for her mistress, feeling the droplets of lifeblood stain her own wrists—spots, she fears, will forever taint her loving hands. Yet the artist-heroine bears an expression of ferocity, determination, duty, a lust to end her own suffering, her own Holofernes, the bearded face of her mentor blanching like the pale sheets he lays upon, a gasp of revelation upon his lips not unlike the gasp of when he ravished her, the ignorant expression of lust painted on his face and neck.
It is the shadows that give the women their blessing, the melancholy contrast of light and dark absorbed in the drapery that give witness to the carnal sin as it lingers in the glowing oils.
Lessons in Tourism

i. At the Center

I remember the first night we saw the grand Duomo, how brilliantly the street lamps gave the piazza its sheen, how the shadows carved every intricacy of the façade—but it was the crowd that lit the streets ablaze, as if to say to the baptistery, We made you. We define you.

We sat on the steps, a crowd, our backs to the cathedral, not one of us gazing at the dome, none of us praising the herring-bone brick, the pink and green stonework, the marble faces of the saints. We had become tourists, simply, living here, yet not living, seeing things, whilst not seeing, praying to the majesty of vendors with light-up trinkets, as gypsies thrust stemfuls of roses into our American hands.

ii. While Learning to Cook Gnocchi

He shows us how to peel the boiled potatoes in one smooth motion, brown skin shrugging off the precious white meat like a chrysalis.

The bare oval is soft and sacred in my palm, pillow of an egg ready to hatch into a delicacy we’ve waited months to prepare, the way the desire to become Italians has somehow become the desire to cook like Italians, the overwhelming foreignness and sweetness of our new diet making us forget the language of American cuisine—we seek only the words of pasta and prosciutto, mozzarella, gorgonzola.

We squeeze spaghetti-like tendrils from the potatoes with an iron-cast grater tool we’ve never seen before, clamping the metal handle down on each orb to press the softness through.

So many we mash—

when we finish, there is a mountain on the table—and so the chef tells us to knead the mound just so.

So we stuff our hands in, feeling warmth and softness, and we let it seep into our flesh.

We caress vegetable-meat as dough—kneading “the wrong way”— then try to knead like

Italians, pushing from the top (not folding out).
At last we tenderly chop the dough into its tiny, almond-shaped bits, brush the bits with the scrape of our fork, drop the bits into boiling water.

We wait for our potato-pasta to rise to the top, for we think it means we, too, have been cooked; we are finally shedding our American skins, molding our ideal Italian selves, the simple recipe of flour and potato.

iii. After Giambologna’s Sculpture “Rape of the Sabine Women,” in the Loggia dei Lanzi

A foreign woman must never be alone in Florence, but the Italian woman knows how to behave, with her proud neck, stern stare, emotionless stride, repelling the hungers of male passersby.

Botticelli painted his Renaissance woman in a box, hand on her frame with a slight door in the background, a grey portal of receding space, her home, an entryway without exit, muddled colors of brown and white and black furnishing a domestic prison.

Filippo Lippi gave her confessional without grace, a captor’s face pressing through the window,

(more of a square hole in the wall)— occupied online by that singular profile, her husband, her only link to a world outside, peering in with a yellow-and-black crest of lineage in his hand, passing the symbol through the hole, reminding her of her duty inside, the laws she must obey as a lady of the home, forbidden from seeing the brilliant hues beyond her walls.

Only the easels of men linger in these modern streets—watercolors-in-progress sold beside posters of Mona Lisa and the Birth of Venus.

Should a female artista pass by, she may glance at his fine work, but must hurry, return to her haven of privacy to paint in secret, confined still by the brushes of Renaissance fathers—and so I watch from the steps with my sketchpad, wondering still how the curves of the marble figure seem to breathe in its steadfast, permanent quiet, the Sabine woman forever barren in the grasp of her Roman, who clutches her white back with the grip of a master.

iv. At the Conservation Demo

Today rabbit-skin glues are still used for restoring art objects and paintings.

The conservator paints spots on a canvas with animal glue, as if it were salve of aloe, healing scabs of bare, ripe linen with the medicine of chemistry.
A poco a poco, little by little,
   an Umbrian halo is reborn, alchemized by the blessing of the sacred hare.
Apocalisse

“The water was more sombre far than perse;
And we, in company with the dusky waves, Made entrance downward by a path uncouth.
A marsh it makes, which has the name of Styx, This tristful brooklet, when it has descended Down to the foot of the malign gray shores.”
- Dante Alighieri, The Divine Comedy, Canto VII

In 1966, the city of Florence flooded from wall to wall, the Arno spilling into piazzas, as if making drinking basins for the gods.

The water was brown like cappuccino, froth lapping at green-shuttered windows, swirls of chocolate and white seeping into the stucco.

Our guide speaks of panic, the Florentine fear that the city would drown, its Madonnas and Venuses suffocating in the waves.

Not the birth of a goddess, but a death—the death of great art and great beauty.
It would become a new Venice—rivers and streams replacing the streets and alleyways, piazzas transformed to oceans, threatening ornate palaces with the constant undulating sequence of waves—but without that Venetian order, no structure of azure waterways, simply a city steeped in ruined pigments and dissolved masters, a murk of ruins protruding from the depths of that brown, purgatorial crease in the earth.

The stucco buildings remember, stained walls dirtied by the past, the taint of silt mixed with floodwater becoming a crude beacon of buon fresco as the layers of grey mortar are revealed in haphazard scrapes upon the walls, the river’s violent step in the process of painting a master’s mural—the pigment lies unfinished, never fused with the plaster, color never brushed to its tender, wet surface.

The Florentines memorialize all that was lost, swallowed by Neptune’s centennial purge.
At an English Cemetery in Florence, in September

The trees here burst from the earth like Corinthian pillars, supporting an invisible temple to an unknown divinity, perhaps some mortal goddess inhumed in the hill of Florentine soil.

Libby, in grand cursive text, and below it,

Elizabeth Russell Jarves
Wife of James Jackson Jarves
Of Boston Massachusetts Died in Florence 1861.

It is true about snails and graveyards, that they linger on stones, pebbles, rocks clustered about the dead, feeding on the lasting sentiments of decaying flesh.

Libby, whoever she was,
    may as well have been my cousin, grandmother, mentor even, now ashes and minerals left as sacred remnants in a reliquary coffin of marble two centuries beneath my feet.

The predecessor to my Italo-American existence, born of my own harbor thousands of miles away, she bequeaths me her final assimilation in the form of little white flowers along the path, dusty green sprigs of some violet plant — not quite lavender — and the imprint of an orchid upon cold granite.

    I can feel her sigh a breath of homesickness as I sketch the blossoms, quiet rhythms of line and soft charcoal shades, like the gentle forming of new memories, my own heart sculpting a place for itself in the warm autumn earth of Florence, my mind still yearning for the comfort of black New England waters.
The First Sacrament

I read online that there are few beaches in Pisa—some private, some public—but the Marina di Pisa is set in wonderful scenery, with a curved shoreline and azure horizon, surrounded by an urban fabric of many Art Nouveau buildings overlooking the once-resort-style beaches. It is there that we taste the salt of the Mediterranean for the first time, where we stumble over dunes of ocean-scrubbed stones, diamond-white and unforgiving to our bare feet, where we catch the undertow and are hypnotized by the undulating waves, carrying us in and out, a siren’s call, the blue of the sea whispering from its foreign depths, alluring and filled with the mystique of one who has witnessed the history of the world.

We long to plunge our ignorant bodies into that all-knowing blue, make love to the place we are visiting for just a day, feel as if we are a part of that omniscient something so very far from home.

In a few short hours, our bathing suits will dry and the salt-dust will fade from our skins,

but on this rocky beach and in this moment, our minds ebb with the pulse of the turquoise waters—yet, in our briny skins we feel as static as the sun-bleached rocks we lie upon, waiting for the ocean to weather us in its depths, our European baptism.

Artemisia Leaves Home

In truth, she left because of her father, because she couldn’t stand the way he’d let the men question her, eyes obsidian beetles dressed in suits that barely shifted as they pulled the thick cords tighter, tighter around every precious, warm finger, the courtroom’s weapon crushing her hands in disbelief, searching for a word from her, as if the squeezing knots could draw more than blood, could draw liquid confession from her lips, her tortured body a tube of paint dried in the middle that they kept pressing for one last viscous drop of consent. Slut. Liar. Whore. It was he who had started the ordeal, he who watched them break down his daughter’s honor in the name of his own, he who had pursued “justice” but ignored her pleas of silence, of handling the thing quietly. He watched as the men slowly crushed her tender painter’s fingers, fingers he had taught how to render chiaroscuro as if it were a light on a stage, to brush gesso to canvas like a holy salve, to blend colors and glazes in combinations that could only be alchemical in nature, jeweled pigments a royal emblem of legacy.

Yes, he had watched.

And so she left—and later, she would dance alongside the Arno for her wedding, pearl earrings glimmering with her white satin dress as she spun in the moonlight, her figure like a pillar of water burst from some spring below in the earth.

She married a Florentine, another artist, bore him her own daughter, precious and sweet and young, honeyed hair shimmering in the Tuscan sun as if it were gold leaf from one of her father’s ornate frames, only more intricate and fragile than anything he could ever have made, gentle expression unlike her mother’s in every regard.

When her fingers, raw and crimson, finally healed, she painted anew, commissioned by royalty beyond Rome, gathering her reputation in her cassone, a wooden chest filled with lover’s trinkets she’d never received.

And in every brushstroke, she always found that same tenebrous tone, dark background behind the glow of her figures, the looming presence of sentiment always overtaking her composition, cool and black like the unfathomable, layered secrets—like that hidden man in the darkness who waits, reaching through the canvas as if to shatter her unending coats of translucent glaze paint, splintering into brilliant fragments of the blackest onyx.

Birthright in Celtic

Because of an unknown great-grandfather—nameless and long vanished from photographs like a literary specter, but who my parents say gave me my blood—I decide to go to Dublin, where I eat loaves of warm, brown bread for breakfast, walk along the Liffey river, cross the Ha’penny bridge and listen as a tour guide named Peter explains the Easter Rising in heavy brogue to a crowd of students. I skip lunch to admire the Book of Kells, ornate weavings of monks’ patterns snaking forever into my brain, then explore the tourist shops downtown to finally buy myself a Claddaugh ring, its emblem of crown, hands, and heart cast in brilliant silver, with surrounding band etched with sacred trinity knots. I think of the spectral hands that grip my own heart, pale and forceful, pressing the legacy of Irishness into my existence, clasping my soul with the thought of a life here, the fingers pressing bruises into the corners of my insides like memories, individual pangs in my chest as though the chronology is catching up with me, each death and every loss of a friend tightening its hold on my spirit. I consider how tight the ring feels on my left middle finger, legends and rumors of the symbol muddling together like the blood lineage of my family, an endless labyrinthine path of Polish, Swedish, German, Welsh, and now Irish. We call ourselves mutts like the melting-pot landscape we were born into, cross-European hybrids with a past as foggy as the storming Cliffs of Moher.
I sit in a pub with my pint of Guinness and mull over my family tree—knotted, tangled, and chaotic, as decipherable as a Celtic book-painting.
On Language

It’s the exhaustion of words that kills the body, every salt-tipped consonant and bulleted vowel

a struggle to wield, weapons given to an ignorant youth, the gun of syntax more likely to be turned inward than outward to an opponent.

Lessons can only do so much—walking to the immigration office, my brain mixes translations together like a stew of leftovers, every Italian syllable a soft, mushy carrot and every French article a bone of frozen poulet, the flavors slipping together in a broth so murky that the thought of conversing—forming sentences, making dialogue—is repulsive, nauseating to my weak senses, fragile in their new environment.

One sip of the broth, and it is already rising in my throat like bile, the phrases coming out in jumbled fragments, chunks of knowledge I knew yesterday in a classroom of seven, now expelled from my esophagus in frantic sprays of, “Êst-ce que vous parli—parli inglese?”

Drowning in the prose, lost on the way to the questura, my romantic Firenze disappears, and I see only a city of acrid yellow and sordidly brown buildings, monotonous shapes taunting my American eyes with the blunt honesty of reality, that I am alone in this place called Italia, mute and stranded

as a migrant pigeon, so eager to flock to a new metropolis, flying abroad to seek fresh pickings from the rabble, to feel foreign rain graze my wings as I bathe, but instead, I find myself desperately nipping at the shoes of strangers, hoping, begging, pleading for a single crumb of guidance for my foreign tongue to swallow.

Kalchas the Seer

After an inscribed Etruscan mirror from Vulci, currently held at the Vatican Museums. The back of the mirror depicts mythological Greek figure Kalchas practicing the art of hepatoscopy, a form of divination involving the reading of animal livers.

In a darkened classroom, a professor clicks through slides and stops at a bronze talisman, a flat disk weathered green with a slim, brittle handle protruding beyond the edge of the photo.

Suthina, he says. Grave goods.

ii.

Etruscan women were buried with mirrors, the most intricate of which date to the Hellenistic period—one bronze side highly buffed and polished, the other etched and illustrated—

seen as portals to the next world, the mythological characters beckon souls into the beyond.

Here, a haruspex, soothsayer and interpreter of the gods, holds a liver,

the offering of a supplicant seeking to hear her fortune told, hoping for blessings of marriage, the growth of a family, signs for a future of success, beauty, prestige.

Thought to be the precious miniature rendering of an ancient sky, the liver was the organ of fate and answers, each area diagrammed to understand the symbols for positive and negative forces, constellations reflected in the microcosm of animal flesh. Any blemish is important; any markings on the slick red surface mean a god is involving himself in the events to unfold, channeling powers of good or evil, explained in the tender meat fixed by nature to hold meaning.

The professor tells us an Etruscan adage: Things do not have significance because they happen; they happen because they have significance.

Lightning, birds, livers—all symbols ascribed with meaning in order to find meaning, and so the haruspex becomes an intermediary spirit, his likeness trapped on bronze, in the middle of life and death, body inscribed in metal as a cold token of the dead, with only the pulsing oval power in his hands lingering as a tribute to the prophesies written in the creases of crimson skin.
In the Black Room

After the work of Korean artist Kimsooja, whose work was featured at the 55th Venice Biennale.

First, the removal of shoes, a number given to every visitor, like clients in line to witness some glorious spectacle as we enter the pavilion, a crystalline house of iridescent glass and mirrors. The light of a sun, emerging from the faded rain, seeps through the walls, soaking us with warmth as we wait transfixed by the glimmering chamber, so much that our eyes are hyperactive with the energy of rainbows when they call us in.

You will be in the room for one minute.
Do not speak.
You may sit, or stand, or lean on the wall as you are compelled to do so.

Warm darkness, followed by a singular cough, then silence, a gradual syncopation of breathing, the harmonious confusion of visitors, invisible heartbeats quietly pounding in the dark, eyelids painted over by the black.
An anechoic chamber—a room with no echo.
There’s an inversion of color, the absence of texture and light, of movement and sound—o chiaroscuro here.
We are in the umbra itself, the shadow of the soul.
A taste of death
with no echo.
Introversion, reflection, fear, and yet—
ignorance for a solid sixty seconds.

_You may exit._
For Auntie

My godmother said that when she died, she wanted her ashes scattered three times— in the Gulf of Mexico, for her mother, and for the dolphins; on the Atlantic, for us, the family, the Bostonians; and upstate New York for her birthplace, her childhood, her soul. We did as she wished, but I still dream of her fragments wandering like pixie dust, specks of gold on the wind and in the tumultuous gray currents, always shifting, never settling, restlessly lost in travel, not knowing home from heaven.
iii.
Artemisia Accompanied on Lufthansa Flight 0161

On the plane home he calls me stranger, three years past on trains and flights over thin-lined, fragile European borders, penciling in our itineraries with expatriate dreams, discussing Kerouac and T.S. Eliot, yet somehow he never knew even my fondness for rain—standing in it, drinking it, cupping the viscous wells of liquid diamonds in my palm, collecting my ideas (city rain the favorite)— metallic, grey like the taste of painting a figure in shadow, slippery highlights in brilliant white like tendrils of thought in storm, some deity-muse pounding leaden motivations in my ear from above, singing from the corner most cumulonimbus in the brain.
My companion calls my ramblings too lofty for reality—but what is reality then but a tapestry of cold wire, stern and yet fluid as the pigment mixtures I ache to hold in my bare hands?
He does not care for me, for my starving wish for him to understand the way the night clouds outside our window look like a poem to me, like the cosmos projected itself solely for us and for this aircraft.
Supposing travel unravels these singed copper threads, fraying the negative space between us like a blanket of charred filaments, out of our blindness we let the contact-lens revelations slip into our naked eyelids like second nature.
He orders another free glass of wine and I sip my black coffee, admiring the pools of jetlag in his pupils that bleed into those dark irises, saturated with distance and air miles.
Matters of Modernity

In 2013, the theme of the Venice Biennale was Il Palazzo Enciclopedico, or The Encyclopedic Palace.

_The theme of the 2013 Venice Biennale:_
art made by those who did not initially consider themselves artists.

Outsider art: meaning, made by outsiders—craft borne out of otherness, out of obsession,

the need to create something beyond our limited horizons, an art sculpted from everyday relics.

In one room, a Christian altar, but atomized—crumbled and electrocuted into pale silt that piles in the center of the room as stately ashes like an alchemy of form, solid to dust—

and no gilding, no rectangular symbol of religion, just a mound of grey, like remnants of tired pigment swept cleanly from the corners of the gallery, devoid of color yet still labeled as art, still considered a statement of the utmost politics.

In another space—knickknacks and cluttered spaces, documents of obsession like the implications of the show, Encyclopedic Palace,

an archive of everything created or collected in the world.

From the ceiling hang elaborate contraptions and planetariums of wire and string, the found objects of a hidden narrator who could not throw a stone away, filing and stashing and assembling her life in these trinket installments of metallic sentiment.

An encyclopedia of the contemporary cannot define what is contemporary.

To be modern: meaning, of the present moment.

Progressive.
To be progressive: meaning, to question the present.

To be a modern artist is to question the intricacies of the world like collections of bejeweled waste, each token an indicator of what has been

and where we will go, the modern people—

back into the ceaseless archive of sacred paper, paint, and dust.
Connection

I once saw a deer’s corpse on the highway in the back of a green pickup truck. Its antlers were marked with yellow tape, and its still-moist mouth slipped open, a tiny cavern of black, dripping cold saliva on dusty fur.

I watched its legs splayed on the metal bed,

flanks once full of fervor and haste,

lying there, silent.
   The car sped past, yet

a single thread connected me to it, an iridescent vein, linking my pulse to the empty body.

Speak to me, I begged through the windshield.

Tell me your secret,
   your long-forgotten story.
Art and Artlessness

It seems sentimental, but I can’t help but remember that I once built a puzzle-Duomo years ago with an old boyfriend, before travelling the world was an option, before history was tangible, and all he and I had of Europe and of intimacy were eight-hundred-and-two pieces of false I love you’s compressed into impossible, minute fragments of foamcore.

It was an old souvenir present, a prize bought by his travelling father,

the one who had been places, who had been to Florence before.

My seventeen-year-old self scooped up handfuls of the puzzle, thrilled at the challenge, but he, sixteen-years and melancholy, only frowningly acquiesced — he’d put it together before.

Can we do something else?
Constructing the campanile was easy, I learned, its patterns of pale rose, deep green, and grey-veined marble triangles, among other shapes, somehow harmoniously forming the immense rectangular pillar, a bell-tower of Giotto’s handiwork.

The basilica, the dome, our _Santa Maria del Fiore_, that was the hardest part.

The colored foam pieces—machine-screened to mimic the cathedral like a photographic façade—they were hodgepodge, fragments barely fitting together like uneven stones in a crude mosaic, roof tile for roof tile a struggle to replicate.

Our clumsy young fingers weren’t nimble or skilled enough, hadn’t seen the real Duomo to know what it truly looked like, hadn’t known that it couldn’t possibly have been built by teenage hands; its Tuscan bricks and rosy marble, its grand gilded cross—they were too ancient, too Renaissance for us to understand.

Back then, it was the year we would elect the first black president—it was the year of change, of pioneering the body, of gay rights debates and abortion obsessions, of searching for solutions;

Take us out of the Middle East, we said in the U.S., though what part was middle and what was east, I couldn’t say at the time.

Obama was a character on television, an unreachable symbol on a poster that we, the youth, somehow, could love without knowing what love was.

Just the same, I finished the puzzle somehow, even after my friend folded, and simultaneously, I found my own Middle East—middle, the red, burning place in my stomach for both knowledge and loneliness, and east, the direction on the compass that would lead me to find my Renaissance self, eastward over the Atlantic and toward the orange sunrise of the Mediterranean, to the land of Giotto and Michelangelo,

where every green stone and pink brick fit into place.
I took a class on how to paint as they did during the Renaissance, to prove that I could still be an artist, a painter of Madonnas and mythologies
with my ashen brush, ground to a powder
and scattered years ago, forcibly discarded by the allure of the lab over the studio.

An Italian couple taught me how to prepare the animal glue—rabbit, pig, cow, fish—stirring the fetid scents in a mason jar, _artistic chemistry_, the substance looking more like shimmering spirits than diluted fat.

I made a canvas panel by hand, brown, scratched linen plastered to a piece of scrap wood, gessoed properly with glue and gypsum, and sketched the face of an angel to its surface.
They taught me to apply silver leaf, a small squat brush of squirrel hair my tool to adhere paper-thin sheets of the glimmering metal for my angel’s halo.

The oil from my skin, as instructed, became my new adhesive with every touch of the brush to my cheek, followed by a touch to the precious foil, divine magnetism clinging silver to squirrel.

By the time I was ready to paint, my panel was already an artwork—it had become a subtle merging of organic and inorganic, the animal glue conversing with the oil from my skin, minerals greeting minerals on the underside of my gilded project.

Still, the paint strokes, I finally learned, were of minerals too—crushed stones and precious ores ground to pigment and mixed with egg yolk, an odd solution of textures that somehow stirred gracefully into tempera.

On canvas, I touched strokes in thin lines—hatching, not blending—crisscrossing, not daubing—each mark permanent, fusing with the canvas like a portable fresco.

There could be no change, only progress, more layering.
I wanted some miracle of DaVinci’s spirit to overcome me, or perhaps Giotto’s would do—some revelation, artistic possession, passion, any feeling of wonder to pass through me, but I only thought of those layers, the work built from wood to icon like a microcosm of the world, sediment upon sediment, pigments upon pigments of labor forming strata across the Earth’s surface, man’s history manifest in the image of a grinning seraphim. iv.

The hardest part is the sitting hours on end, back against the dirty Roman cement of a wall, and her daughter, five years old, blushing with crimson pigments and seated in her lap, dressed in her cleanest, most innocent of pink t-shirts, sleeves too big for tiny shoulders, elbow-sleeves resigning a sigh of adulthood.

Because she is the mother, the dish and sign are for the girl and her sharpie scrawl reads: Aiutate per favore mia filia ha fame.

She doesn’t think
of lost commissions,

her sold brushes,
the father who would scorn to see her live like this—

she doesn’t think

of the artist-husband who let her leave,

content with the docile model who became Aphrodite in his hands as he caressed her form with titanium white, burnt siena, cadmium yellow from the studio—

and she does not think of the businessmen rushing past

(more men in suits) as other mothers with shiny strollers push their young ones the way home, those who skirt their eyes forward, intent on personal train-track itineraries, her alms dish ignored, feared, avoided like a plastic symbol of their fate in five, ten, twenty years.

It’s the warmth of her daughter’s sweaty t-shirt that keeps her there, makes her feel like she is still an artist, rhythm of her tiny legs bouncing in her lap, a synesthesia of palettes harmonizing with the clattering of metal travellers on the platform below.

On Defeat

After Laocoon and his Sons, the original Greek sculpture possessed by the Vatican Museums.

Is this death,
the gasp of fear

in the father’s eyes, the pulse of the jugular and abdominal muscles arching back, into no plane at all, empty space caressing the limbs of marble as he falls backward (sculpture in the round)— all tangled limbs, no bed of violet porphyry,

(the stone of emperors) veined with ropes of white to catch his body as the serpent throws him into the void.

The boys, barely frowning, bear furrowed brows, fearful lips, yet no exclamation of agony, not a gasp of pain nor the grimace of fear carved into their cheeks, only surprise, then acceptance while Apollo’s pet thrashes his ivory jaw into their father’s hip.

It is as if this is no death at all, only a dream, pictorial representation as it is—like they know they are but a story, and assume their descent into the negative space of myth, that blank unoccupied hollow between object and life, like their father before them falling into the bleak air with purpose, only calmly sacrificing physical lives in favor of fictional ones, suffocating the limbs of history in the trembling scales of an undulant monster.

Nature Morte

After a still life by Dutch artist Rachel Ruysch (1664-1750) exhibited at the Palazzo Pitti in Florence.

How gently the salamander laps from the egg-milk, the orange peel of yolk revealed like an oasis broken from the cracks of white shell,

a tender moment, I feel, and yearn to enter the scene.

I become the dark, clumsy fly hovering towards a peach while nearby paper moths land on grey foreground,

a singular snail slipping out of the frame, as if in migration—fleeing from the pantheon of creatures, flora and fauna.

The colors of the fruits—pale yellow, mauve, deep indigo—remind me of the cosmos, each peach a swirling Jupiter and every plum a radiant, violet-and-crimson moon, and I notice everything here is ovalescent, rounded, circular—petals of an intimate daisy, translucent bubbles of grapes, moss of a bird’s nest.

And yet, I cannot determine whether it is more about the circles or the cycles — caterpillar hatching from a corner leaf as my salamander sips the once lifeblood of a bluebird, and so, simple as a fly, I mentally touch every plant, feeling every pearl of a shape before they vanish into the varnish.

Day Trip to Liscannor

When we visited the Cliffs of Moher, it was a Saturday, and the wind was stronger than it had been in years, we were warned.

Five miles long and still these rocks endured, Druid air purging off unwanted visitors like some mystical force field, flinging tourists about like the long, dark grasses of the cliffs, heads bending in pain from the wind as if one false move could tear them off the edge, as effortless as plucking a dandelion from the earth.

   It was a test, a way to determine those worthy to look upon the edge of the world, and from the moment we glimpsed the tumultuous waters below, my body felt an army of invisible sprites on the wind, pulling me toward the edge in one instant, and in the next, pushing me away from the view as shards of ice and battalion gales threatened with the promise of an oncoming storm.

With helpless exhilaration I pushed my way to the top, up a path with no barriers, no stones, just dirt, grass, and the looming edge.

   It was there that I found myself accidentally blessed by the grey portal of sky, looking out upon the god-hewn cut of earthen crust sliced into the Druid sea.

   Everything became a shade of grey then, the landscape of water, earth, and sky more vibrant than any stained glass window I’d seen,

Irish nymphs painting the ocean this time in soft, mysterious washes of muddy green and blue-black, a misting abyss of myriad hues.

I turned for one moment, and suddenly without control began to run along the path of mud down the hill,

back to my bus on the gusty wings of some elusive spirit, banished for seeing too much.

Driving Past Dead Sunflowers in October

Crippled and brown, as if burnt, shriveled from weeks of thirst, yet still they are as tall as scarecrows, thin roots staking the dirt with some unfeeble strength, heads sagging in a downward glance as if to make sure they are still there, the legumes that tie them to the earth, gossamer umbilical threads yet to be cut.

Though I know this is how it is here, this is how the harvest is done (by killing the golden crop in late summer), still I feel an internal companionship with these bodies as they wait, solemnly, for the black gems to slip from their mouths, seeds tokens of another year gone, one year closer to the inevitable turning of the field to fallow.

The Aftermath

After Judith and Servant with the Head of Holofernes by Artemisia Gentileschi, currently exhibited at the Galleria Palatina of the Palazzo Pitti in Florence.

How sudden the women turn their heads, as if startled by some metallic clang of footsteps in the dark, as if the Caravaggist dark will fade and reveal some figure of a witness, a decapitated king, perhaps, chasing lady and servant through the incriminate, sinister passage of hero into shadow, chiaroscuro on soft flesh eroding into a burnt contrast of black dirt and sallow skin.

It is not the invisible visitor that frightens the pair, but the abrupt realization of a completed task, servant’s hand grazing the tyrant’s bloodied hair as she clutches the scarlet-drenched basket to her hip.

Where do they go, these baroque, biblical daughters of Nike, when the deed is done?
To Rome, Florence, Naples – like the artist who fashioned them, hiding in the bright, feminine light of solitude, safe from the hauntings of man, yet condemned to forever paint their own regal images until death, carving regret into every golden skirtfold with the flat steel of a pallet knife.
Pilgrimage

I was told once there was a man who lived beneath the highway in the secret passage

I would walk to school, right after the neighborhood creek, city-grey and gurgling, and just past the morning market, fragrant and bustling with the aroma of paper euro.

My roommate and I,
we slipped through curtains of European clothing, grazing the soft fabric with our foreign fingertips, passing the alluring smells of earthy patate and sweet fichi to find your tunnel, the underground path

not quite a subway, but an intersection

for bicyclists and walkers, italiani e americani.

The first time we ventured to visit you, you had left poems for us by the entrance, paper leaflets of Italian prose pasted over graffitied walls, words I did not yet understand, and they sank into the earth with the pavement

as our concrete sidewalk became a ramp downward, guiding us below.

Under the highway and within the dim-lit passages, we found your paintings, spraypainted friezes of brightly colored animals and movie stars, bohemian calligraphy and modern landscapes,

and we remembered you were supposed to be a curator, guardian of the city’s most hidden gallery, hiring Michelangelos to fresco the underground, even painting the ceiling with caricatures of bloated figures.

We thought we saw you once, twice, maybe three times, but each time you were different.

First, you were a slim Latino, quiet and mopping the asphalt, pausing only to call a “Ciao, bella” as we passed.

The second, you were a tanned, Italian uncle handing out ribbonless balloons to a family of five, chattering with the children and smiling at the parents.

The third, you were a greying artist, sitting solemnly in your fold-out desk and chair, watching us pass through while your radio played the local orchestra, your greeting to us, the two American girls.

But we never saw you, the secret hero of modern Florence, guardian of the jeweled halls between our apartment and the rest of the city.
We never saw you touch the walls, only witnessed the transformation of one mural to another, a cartoon of dogs painted over to become a black abstract sky filled with hyphens of brilliant yellow, exclamation points of cadmium red, touched with stars of Russian blue.
Our visits merely became a daily rhythm, always searching,
always wandering the curious path into the tunnel and out—At the Antique Market

In one stall, mingled among trinkets I find boxes of images, clipped memories from some age-worn camera, long retired from use and forgotten by the vendors.

Each photo I thumb through—imprints of silver-tinted breaths, portraits of faces blurred by mountain air, the sea, a backyard, snapshot colors fading like cheap makeup.

Still I feel the heat of the yellows, the coolness of the greens, the fragility of the black and the white as if they are what make the people in the photographs smile at the tourists who buy them, fifty cents apiece, immortal faces somehow knowing they will be carried overseas, displayed to foreign faces, their likenesses tokens of trips to an extraordinary place.

How extraordinary, I think, between the age stains on the back of every one, the softened, round corners of the frame, the slim white border that hugs the image, and the cursive, brown notes with dates in the margins—that these fill three, no, four—five boxes full, as the seller brings out more, five boxes full of printed memories, paper people who, without the pictures, may have never even existed.

The Return

Ugly, the first word that comes to mind, buildings made of gray cardboard, the angles of their rooftops too sharp to hold wisdom, too blunt for regality—such is my landscape of gray; gray, spelled with the rotund vowel for apathy, the color of the new city, not grey, the hue of foreign mists, the hue marking clouds of ecstasy and enlightenment.

Brick, no rusticated yellow do I see, the muddy red almost brown from just a few centuries of wear, and I think of other rooftops, the brilliant terra cotta not yet faded from days of sun, nor slurried from rain-filled afternoons, afternoons when I walked home after class alone,

pondering the collecting pools of crystalline city water on the stones, wondering if this same water touched the ancients above, if they could hear my solitary thoughts as I placed my foot in each puddle.

The colors there never faded—yellows, browns, pinks—all saturated by the people who walked its streets, stories bonded with the walls like layers of wet fresco, still damp and moldable, but destined for permanence.

Back here in the grayness, permanence is a fairytale aspiration—my Crayola-clay streets will not live on, nor will the cardboard buildings, fragile and naïve as American eggshells—How, in our unquiet resilience, will we last, the new people of the West, when we watch our paper fortresses disintegrate every day, slippery molecules gradually dissolving in the rainwater, and the universe learns to forget?

Artemisia in Ecstasy

After Saint Mary Magdalene by Artemisia Gentileschi. Currently exhibited in the Galleria Palatina of the Palazzo Pitti in Florence.

Is this she,

the woman of golden skirts, one who clutches at her breast as if tormented by some innermost burst vein of longing, black room lit from beyond the frame

(because agony is best felt in the dark) — she who cut her long golden tresses in penitence,

frayed ends threads of hair hanging like shredded sinews by the ears —

I can see her, gilded dress falling from her shoulder in an act of spiritual freeness, her bare collarbone blessed by the sacred unseen flickering flame, and it is to me she glances emptily, woman-hero of my Old Testament, tortured paintress, humble barefoot Maddalena — my Judith in repentance, frail and yet calm,

cool in the wake of her lifelong turmoil.

The lips part,

and in that singular silver breath of piety,

(or perhaps it is regret) she becomes the afflicted, no longer a face of fortitude, yielding instead to the aging of womanhood, her likeness fading

into the company of feminist progeny, another heroine lingering in paper-worn textbooks, legacies inscribed on a page, but still emblazoned on canvas—and so her story is exhaled before me and into my lungs with the sigh of longevity, and it shimmers—

saturated with the thick, iridescent narrative of one who has endured.
